In the short history of Vietnam War literature, publishers would hardly touch a book on the war until the late s and early s—a part of the self-induced national amnesia about that conflict and its outcome. The loss of human life was staggering: "up to 10 million men [fell] on the battlefield – and another 20 million were wounded. If they [were] pleading the Fifth Amendment right that protects against self-incrimination, they could be summarily imprisoned for contempt of Congress.
