And fourth, before concluding, it is necessary to recall the implementation of different models of suburban governance in different regions of the world. Seeking spatial justice. Transforming Distressed Global Communities.

In short, we argue that urban regions are recurrently re-territorialized as cities. As major North American global city-regions, they present diverse strategic mechanisms and contexts for regionalization and post-suburbanization in broadly similar geopolitical settings. This characterization of a new institutional regime leads to the question of whether it accentuates socio-spatial inequalities and segregation or not. As a corollary, we also aim at adopting an adequate methodology to handle discrete individual and spatially indexed socioeconomic data to draw longitudinal analysis and compare data over time.
